

Three whole days passed by, while Seth and company traveled through the continent, going towards a very special area.

They were traveling in a relatively good pace, but since Meihui was not a super strong cultivator, they opted to buy a carriage that could travel fast. The weather was already changing, getting a lot less hot and more humid, meaning they had left the Blazing Phoenix Country already.

In these relatively more normal days, Seth decided to finally start teaching some things to Rina. She had a very good foundation, but lacked experience. So, the first thing they did, was to spar whenever it was possible. Those sparing sessions were often happening in the evening, since it was when the horses pulling the carriage, needed a time to rest and drink water.

Seth made sure to tell her some important points he had observed and to show her, how lacking she was at the attacking site. Even though she could grow plants at a relatively quick speed, only relying on that to fight could be fatal.

The way she had developed her Evergreen Essence was very unique. Seth learnt a bit of that from her as well at their training sessions, but he quickly noticed the best usage of that ability was to restrain a target, since his other offensive abilities were way stronger.

While they were training, Seth asked Lexi for some help in discovering what was Rina's elemental affinity and after many different tests, they discovered she had a higher compatibility with wind and many other minor compatibilities.

But looking at the scenario, the time they had and everything else, Seth chose to teach her what he knew about the wind element, even though he only knew a few things and could not be considered the best teacher on that field.

The problem was that the wind attribute skills he knew of, were the skillbooks he had acquired from the Luberus family, and they were now memories inside his Soul Essence Lake.

It would be impossible to teach her them if not transmitting those memories directly. That problem would've been bigger if their relationship hadn't advanced so much on the last few days. Right now, the only thing missing for that, was the Soul Link Ritual.

Seth didn't waste any time, convincing Rina to enter in a Soul Link with him. When doing such contracts, he made sure to never lie or deceive his women. He told them it all and even more than it was needed, clarifying all their doubts.

Seth and Rina did the contract late at night, sharing an eternal bond together. Differently from how it happened with Arwen, there wasn't a Soul Resonance, but Seth already expected it would be like that. He felt that there were some variables on that effect that came from him and not from luck.

It would take some time until he was able to completely figure out how that effect happened, but in due time, he would be able to create it on his own.

Rina was peacefully sitting cross-legged on the bed, but her mind was actually being bombarded with information.

When she opened her eyes, she was amazed to discover that she knew how to use wind attribute skills. But knowing and executing them were two different things. Seth knew those skills after seeing the skillbooks, but still took him an entire week to master them all.

Actually, his speed of acquiring mastery on that particular element could only be considered as inhuman. Rina wouldn't be able to do something like that, not because of her talents, but because Seth was a monster that should not be used as a comparison target.

When Rina returned to the present, Seth was looking directly towards her beautiful green eyes. They were just like two precious green jade jewels.

Without waiting for anything, he suddenly casted a barrier around their room, isolating sound and even the energy fluctuations. After that, he immediately jumped towards her, making sure to continue the ritual they've been doing every night.

Tomorrow, the group would finally reach the Blue Breeze Nation, the place they needed to cross before reaching the Glazed Lake Sect location.

The Blue Breeze Nation, was a very calm and collected country of the human territory. It didn't take part in any conflict and no one brought trouble to them as well. They lived in peace with the external powers, even though that place wasn't special at all. Not even their rankings within the most powerful countries were good enough.

This place was peaceful just because it was where the Glazed Lake Sect grounds were located. That in itself made the Blue Breeze Nation special. With Such a behemoth resting in their territory, the people living there, were able to rest behind that huge shadow, being free from many worries.

Although no one dared to direct their weapons against them, it didn't mean there weren't internal conflicts. On the contrary, there were many more internal struggles there than in the Blazing Phoenix Country. However, those internal disputes had a peculiar taste of a fight between a brother and a sister. They would fight between themselves, but unite before an external enemy. It's just that there weren't many external enemies, so the internal fights were more abundant than normal.

This country was called Blue Breeze Nation, but in reality, the main attribute cultivated here was water. Its name came from a very beautiful visual effect caused on the wind, when it encountered the abundant water energy in the ocean nearby, acquiring a blue color as it traveled through the air.

Indeed, that place must have been blessed by a deity. Not only it had peace in such a troubled environment that was the Alteria continent, but the people that lived there could enjoy that beautiful phenomenon, together with very beautiful beaches.

Seth's carriage finally crossed the border, entering the Blue Breeze Nation territory.. They were heading towards the Azure Breeze city, where Seth would be able to acquire all the information he needed, before heading towards the Glazed Laked Sect.
