“Morning.” Jaydon carried breakfast, knocked on the door, and entered Elaina’s office. Their relationship had been progressing these days. They could hardly be called good friends, but they had become friends anyway, which was a development he was glad to see.

“Good morning.” Elaina looked up at him. Seeing him come over with breakfast again, she said helplessly, “You really don’t have to do this. Saving lives is what I should do.”

“I’m not doing this just because you saved my dad.” As Jaydon spoke, he placed the breakfast in front of Elaina and looked her in the eye.
