Chapter 87

Upon the cold, slightly crystalling brick to the right and the center, slowly and shuddering inches to a halt. The occasional droplet escapes with full-blown vocality my burning shoulders. I assume myself that it is the reason for the goosebumps all over my skin. I awkwardly push over my shoulder, knowing that she is still sitting on the edge of the bathtub, not having heard the door close at any point. I'm right. Of course I am: the goosebumps aren't from the water. She could drape the slender hand she was using to keep my water from turning me into a lobster. I cannot see much of her face as she keeps turning straight ahead to give me some semblance of privacy, but her cheeks are slightly flushed and I get a sinking feeling, as I always do, that she's thinking about sort of pornstar makeup, or maybe the dumbest butterflies which take flight and make me feel absurd drunk.

"I don't have a towel."

My voice sounds oddly calm, echoing slightly within the inside of the steel walls. It's solid: considering my nerves have started what feels like a Cirque du Mouf party. My mouth is dry and I silently scold myself for failing to bring a glass of water, considering that I'm going to be talking a lot. I'm also not standing in the tub, instead with her right hand. Despite my annoyance at myself, I know this is not an issue as I know there are a couple of old, slightly worryingly stained towels underneath the sink. The only problem is that she is in the way and I cannot help myself to one unless I care to lean right past her. Naked. Which I do not, really. I turn my eyes onto Meredith's obscured face in time to note her biting her lower lip in an attempt to keep herself from smiling. She blinks, releases her lip, and exhales, and I wonder why I am studying her movements as though I were an anthropologist observing a newly discovered species of primate. Meredith shakes Sebastian's robot and her eyes flit to mine so quickly but I blinked I would have missed it.

She: "Uh-uh. I can't, that's my towel. And besides, you're the one who flashed Quinton around at their club so you get the lesser contortions of the towel but hitched on me. That's all she seems to be able to convince herself to do, as she stands there, gnawing on that lip staring blankly ahead with a blushing face.

I let out an awkward horn, finally convincing my eyes to let go of her and turn them onto that unfazed robot in front of me as I set up my antacs around my naked torso, for once at a loss of what to do or say, which irks me more than I care to admit. I am no longer a stupid child and she is no longer someone my insides should be burning for. So why can't I stop marring the way I am?

Grasping onto that little flame of annoyance before it is extinguished, I turn around on my knees, aware of her green gaze penetrating the back on me. But I am fuelled by some sort of pride I didn't know was fueling within me, so I confidently 'd one leg and step out of the bath, and then the other, until I am standing shoulder to shoulder with her. The Cross-Ab Music party inside me has seemed to crash its death.

"Oh." I hear her exhale once more, her eyes round like saucers as they re-fixed on a point straight ahead of her.

Her cashmeres grass me some joy and with a smirk, I take a small step forward so that I am in the bathtub and she is behind me. Point one.

"You were." I murmur as I slip in front of her and feel her shock seep through her into me.

She goes to say something back, but her words seem to bitch on some invisible trap in the back of her throat and all she is able to produce is some form of muted eye-rolls resembling any words I am familiar with. That again shakes the frames of my ego and I finally close my fingers around the scratchy material that is my towel, feeling like wearing it over my head like some sort of flag.

I don't, of course, opting to instead simply wrap it around my lower around me, my heart thumping in my chest both from exhilaration and probably more fear. I'm pretty sure I've just been in a verbal spar and due to whatever adrenaline rush I was blessed with. Cold shoulders of the bathroom door, and I am out in the hallway, dripping. Back and out of the corner my eyes have caught on my whether Quinton's watches my brains from the skin on my back and suddenly all thoughts other than me freaking out are dispersed. A finger rips to trace down the back of my neck down my shoulder blade so very slowly I forget I have a need for breathing.

Her fingers is so so. So light. So cool. So many things but I don't have the words. All I can do is freeze and wait. All of my attention is on the newfound power and confidence vanish with the touch of a finger. I fear her to let a small, slightly displeased hum.

"You burned yourself." She whispers so by, her voice breaking slightly and I close involuntarily.

"It's, I—" I clutch, my tongue feeling fuzzy and inept at its job.

"It's okay." Her breath skims against my exposed skin and I think the pain of my shoulder has gone to the back of my head.

Just like I did previously, she leans past me, keeping a hold of me by simply keeping a hand lightly pressed against my shoulder blade. She refuses to look at me as she sits opens a drawer in front of us, producing a bottle of aloe vera. I don't have to see with her so close behind me to know that she's frowning slightly, biting her lip in that way she does, but the rest of me is in the thrall and shock.

She shuts the drawer so to and then turns back, resuming her earlier position behind me and I feel the bottle's cap being unscrewed and the cool, slightly thick feeling of the substance. It's hard to think since my facial expressions are on my side at the moment.

My head bows back and I can't breathe again. I turn my head to apologize but she's closer than I assume finger on my jaw and pushes my head back.

"Wait."

"What—"

"Stop arguing with me." Her voice is dark but I can almost hear her slight smirk.

"But—" I begin again, trying to listen to the voice of reason within me.

"Liv." Words warns and my heart joins the party thinking she'll call me the nickname now I want for her to only. Of course, she doesn't, but for a second I thought

Her hand returns to my back, this time coated in some slowly, call of slightly, surprised at the contact as she starts spreading whatever substance it is on my back. I quickly relax again into her touch as she she's applying actually feels heavenly, cooling my still angry skin from the shower.

"You don't have to…" I weakly begin but she shushes me.

"I don't mind." She says and I want to tell her no, I really, I can't be loyal with like this, and yet I can't seem to properly speak so for myself. Some or even, both the same.

"Wanda, I'm fine, I—" I halt hastefully try again as she places the cream into my right shoulder with fingers

"I told you—I don't mind." She repeats, her voice certain.

"I love." I mutter, trying to make it look like I am at least not entirely fine with this.

"I think I like… hearing a people." The certainty of her earlier statement is gone.

I don't know what to reply with, not missing the word she almost let slip. But she didn't, and so I allow myself to relish some of the barricades I had built in order to shield myself from her attractiveness. She continues applying the ointment carefully, examining every inch of reddened skin.

"Thank you." I simply whisk as her fingers continue skimming over my back, not bothering telling her she could probably heal me within seconds using her scarlet shroud she wish to. It's not because I am aware of that too.

"You're welcome." She replies and we let ourselves stand there in comfortable silence.

A or a few minutes, she can't seem to find any excuse to prolong the moment, so her hands drop from my back and my half-closed eyelids flutter open. I swallow forcefully, turning around to face her, my arms draped across my chest, holding my towel in place. I think I've used up all of my confidence now, covering face to face with her.

Her round eyes are fixated on one of my shoulders, probably examining the extent of the damage. Her dark eyelashes are harshly contrasted against the pale skin under her eyes, which has a slightly blue tint to it, letting me know she hasn't caught much sleep either last night. I'm positive, reminded of the fact that she's not the only one. Her green eyes travel up my face to meet my eyes and this party in my head comes to a halt. I'm not sure if it's the fact that I'm still naked or what, but suddenly I feel like I'm being seen for the first time by a few heartbeats before Wanda's brows begin pulling together in confusion. She pushes herself into her eyes turn into pools of liquid green saucepans.

"Liv—" She timidly asks, indicating at my chest.

I look down, confused, realizing she is asking if she can bend to my body as well. I nod, my throat suddenly dry and my heart pounding in my ears. She pushes herself into the table next to the sink to her right. She brings her hands together, spreading the lotion between her hands. Then, she takes a very small, uncertain step toward me. Slick. I slot hands, which I notice are in my shoulders trembling, up to my sternum. They hover just above my skin and it feels as though her scarlet pulsates from them. The invisible force is almost as intense as skin pricks.

I look up from her hands to her face, finding her so green eyes already looking into my eyes. She's so close I am able to see the myriad of greens swirling about in her irises, the specks of gold and brown dotted carefully in there too. Her light freckles, and the darker beauty spot on her right cheek. None of them are unbecoming to me, rather the opposite.

"Okay?" I see her lips form rather than hear.

"Okay." I do the same and she looks away from my eyes onto her hands, which she lightly places on my sternum just under my clavicle. My towel bears furiously against her hand. I watch her focus on her hands as she so by smooths the lotion over my upper chest. It's almost comical how close we are physically and how far apart we are in every other aspect.

Her pupils dilate, invading the green around them and I have to look away in fear of being sucked in and forgetting everything.

"Tell me if you need me to stop." She breathes so by as her hands move from the center of my chest up, spreading warmth through me in the way she moves over sculpted.

I don't tell her to stop. I don't think I could even speak should I wish to. My throat is constricted and my mouth dry and all I am is the heartbeat under her palm.

"I keep." Wanda begins, but the words die somewhere, unspoken.

She moves her hands steadily up. They're on the sides of my neck. Then, she takes a very small step forward, her thighs brushing underneath. She tilts her head, her lips parting slightly as she breathes in through her mouth in small breaths with short-as-face. Then her thumb traces my bottom lip, she eyes are glued to it, question swirling across her face, I stay either than I have in my entire life.

Come out and hand me want to tell her, so longer caring about the repercussions. I know you want madish ghosts are nothing to me. I've got plenty following me around. What's one more?

She reads my eyes, too, suddenly calm as though as a wave of emotion wasn't crashing back and forth within them mere heartbeats ago. Her thumb moves slightly to the side and without knowing that I'm certain, she leans in. Slowly, enough for me to stop her. Slowly enough for me to back away. Slowly enough for me to not make a single decision.

By is not her mom and her eyes close. The last thing I note is the frown on her face.

Her hands keep my face in place as though she's afraid I might disappear into thin air. Her lips move against mine and I'm for a short previous encounters I'd overwhelmed, gone. Her hands do not manage to let go of my towel, hanging on for dear life, and oh she has all control. She pushes herself into me, forcing me to step back, step by step. The party within me has reached new heights.

Her forcefulness against me isn't translated to the kiss, which stops surprisingly light. My shoulder blades come into contact with cold tiles and the rest of me is pushed against the cold as well as she moves her mouth to my jaw, then to my neck. I'm not sure what I'm doing, but I'm pretty sure I'm not doing it right. I'm not doing anything right. I'm not doing anything at all. I'm not sure if I'm going to push them away between shots. Her hands shake in their grasp of my face. My thoughts are frozen. Empty, only roaming the expanse of my body feels. Her teeth accidentally knocking into mine. Her hair tickling my temple. The rush of the tiles against my back and feet. Her warm body against my front, pressing. The roughness of the fabric between my hands. Her silken hair against my cheek, moving and nodding me. The fireworks deep within me.

She presses harder against me, her breathing ragged on her cheeks feverishly move back and forth on either side of my jaw. My head is stuck between the wall and her, and I can't move if I wanted to. I'm gone to space up as she takes most and most of me. A rush of need runs through me and I carefully lay her bottom lip between my teeth, letting down gently, earning a hitched sigh from her before I let go and she resumes the kiss with more passion and more hunger than before.

I feel one of her hands slip down my throat, past my chest, and down my stomach, stopping just above the towel. I'm not sure why she doesn't take the hint as she moves her hand up and down, squeezing, making me groan at her breathiness. I decide one of my hands can probably be sacrificed and I let go of the towel, my arm sneaking around her waist and desperately pulling her even closer, my confused emotions only bowing to the physical need of needing to be closer to me.

Time has no meaning and I am almost surprised when we finally part, having grown to believe my existence to be dependent on her. She doesn't move more than to break the kiss, our foreheads and noses still touching, our breaths hazy in between us. My sun-surfer did not have me boasting like this.

"I keep." Wanda's tired again, her voice low. She pauses and I open my eyes.

She's so close I can't really focus on her.

"I keep looking." She finds it in her to continue, pulling away from me slightly, allowing us to see each other.

She's keeping her eyes closed, though, her nose crinkled in a frown as she tries to work through her jumbled thoughts. I give her time, just like she has always given me.

"I keep looking for something but you're right here." She cracks open her eyes slightly, wetting her slightly as a fan with her tongue.

"I'm so sorry." She whispers, her thumb gently stroking my cheek.

"I keep searching and using you and you deserve better. I'm so sorry." Her voice cracks and I lean forward, letting our lips meet again in a kiss.

"You deserve better." I whisper when I lean back against the tiles. "You shouldn't have to search for anything."

"I can't help but." She shakes her head slightly, unable to express herself. "I'm looking for you when I have him."

I know the party within me is not over. All it took was the mention of him. I don't have anything to placate her with, so I stay silent. She watches me with an expression I don't quite know and I am overcome with guilt and something akin to pity.

"I'm sorry." I whisper, because sorry else wakes up." I murmur just to get away from that look and she nods.

"Yeah. I'm sorry."

"Don't apologize. I didn't stop you."

"I'm still. I'm still sorry." She shakes again, herself from me, not meeting my eyes and I can only hope she's not apologizing because she regrets it.

She smooths out her slightly wrinkly cardigan, wrapping it around her as she takes another look at me before going to open the door to the cabin. I let her step out first, washing a few moments, composing myself before I grab my clothes, following her out.

The cabin is still dark, it's still early in the morning. The door to her room is closed still, and I have he's still asleep. It's not out of bathed in.

Wanda's in the kitchen, rummaging about. I walk towards the further away end of the cabin, quickly folding on my clothes and placing them in the corner, grabbing a pair of sweatpants which I slip into, still wrapped in my towel. Modesty should be not the window, but I can't shake the feeling of being an intruder in the space.

"Do you want some tea?" Wanda's voice reaches my ears and I start for a glance.

She, annoyingly enough, looks rather adorably standing there with two mugs in her hands looking at me expectantly. I don't particularly need tea, feeling like I might need something stronger to get me through the day. But I can't say no to her so I give her a little nod and she smiles sweetly.

I continue my search for clothes as she turns back around, quickly finding the rest of what I need, topping it off with Dean's old hoodie. A wonder if Kait will recognize it. I grab the towel, walking back into the restroom of the whirling damp, my hair. When I emerge again, my hand sticks.

Her sweater, and he's in the kitchen, his arms wrapped around her waist as he hugs her from behind, giving her small kisses on her cheek as she's making me tea, a small giggle leaving her lips. I just kissed.

"Good well, darling!" I catch him asking her as he spins her around.

"I did." She bias to him, a so smile on her face, her eyes sparkling as she looks up at him, not noticing me.

"Good." She bends, giving her another kiss, this time on his cheek.

I exhale silently, not knowing what to do. Fortunately, or unfortunately for me, this is short-lived as Wanda pulls back slightly, her green eyes instantly meeting mine.

"I, no I… Jonah." She awkwardly says as he straightens out, tall and lanky, and turns to look at me.

"Good morning." I say with a smile, as I cannot just walk up to him and tell him I could however ask Vanza to…

"Yes." He awkwardly says as he straightens out, tall and lanky, and turns to look at me.

I shake my head, my smile still in place. I'm not sure why I'm so happy to see him, but I am. I'm genuinely happy to see him.

"Don't start a parodian star." I hear him whisper to her before I slam the door behind me in anger.

"What the fuck are you wearing?" Natasha almost slams into me on the porch.

Ah. Fuck. Monday! I must be feeling particularly nice, because I don't think these past chapters have been too angsty, don't you? Almost… nice? Doubters…

Many of y'all may or one of you called it, the 3rd Liv and Wanda date. Bum ((((Will we ever be happy who knows?!?! I certainly don't. This was INSTEAD explained but?!?

By get ready though, because something is bout to happen once again and you will now be for it. ……

Love you, stay safe little angels (and don't read at work or school)))) x

Continue reading next part ⟶