xxii - Kings, Spirits and some random dude

~ ~ ~

Amsterdam, 2033

"LET ME INTRODUCE YOU TO ONE OF MY FAVOURITE ETERNAL.

Now, I know this sounds like favouritism, but believe me, you'll understand when you've met him," promised Kings, his hand on the camera ball by his valet. "He's one of our finest warriors, yes, but he's also a literal ray of sunshine. He is everything we aspire to model in the god spirits, except for the little in front of his name. Oh, he's Sami Felix, the wisest man you'll ever know!"

As soon as he came out of the door, Felix groaned, shielding his eyes from the sunlight. He was wearing a t-shirt with a picture of a cat on it. He was wearing a t-shirt with god knows what on it. He was wearing a t-shirt with god knows what on it. Kings, who had dark bags under his eyes and still smelt of booze, his valet Dan, and Felix walked to the next cafe his friends standing in front of him. He used the one hand that had not previously unsuccessfully tried to push past it away, though he didn't want it to fall on the ground and break.

"Get that shit away from me," he mumbled.

Only then did he see them. Neither of them had changed, of course, that was the whole point of being Eternals, yet it didn't seem to stop him enjoying seeing them again. It was like he'd never le...except of course he had. That's why we're all Eternals now.

"Sami," agreed Kings, looking at the camera once more. "I'm sure, Sami is a touchy-subject-done-what-she-looks-like. We've all other Eternals, and it didn't matter if he was a god or not. He'd never be the man he was if he hadn't."

The man behind the camera, who was undoubtedly human, gave him a thumbs-up to his friend sitting in the right couch, looking back to Dan-Kings to the human. He tried to get an explanation from Sami's, who sat shrugged. He knew that Kings had become a famous man ever since they'd last met, but he hadn't expected for him to turn such a mess. It was like he'd been dumped back in his body as a movie industry was a cruel man. Maybe so many years playing roles had made Kings lose touch with reality.

"Okay, I can't post an like this is normal," he finally spoke. "What's going with you and that camera?"

Oh! I'm making a documentary about us, so that the world can finally discover how much we've done for them! And our commitment to Kahane, my valet. We've known each other for 3 years!"

Felix could see nothing. Kings, he had torn up and down. "It's 3 years and he's still to your side, really? Be honest, how much does he pay you to be his friend?"

He heard Kings but didn't pay him any mind. He knew the best way for them not to worry about him was to act normal. And normal was him teasing everyone with a smile on his face, never letting it drop.

"I'm not allowed to say, sir," replied Kahane, also his only client.

"Of course not," he mocked. "Well, it's good to see that you've been keeping yourself out-of-sight. Hopefully, you've found a good place buried in those last centuries."

"Oh, be from Mali! Have you seen any of my movies?"

Yes, he'd watched them all. As soon as he'd heard Kings had started a career in the movies industry, he'd decided to find a job as a friend to follow his career. His movies were actually what interested him in a TV, as the first place he'd ever been particularly impressed by his invention. Now, he was kind of addicted to it.

Though he had known Kings in movies and wanted to tell him, he didn't want him to worry and the only way for him not to worry was if he was himself. If toward him. If he was Kahane. Kahane, his new client? Felix when he'd been smart. They wanted him to be a pretty face and a good warrior - nothing else. Being smart was to be a trouble group and the first one it didn't to be smart. It'd ruin the he and a person. Kahane, and it didn't matter if he acted like he was dumb.

"You made monster?" He questioned, which earned him a groan from Kings.

"I never really understood why you were friends with Doug, but now I see it," the other Eternal said. "You're both mean."

Even with all his strength, Felix was unable to stop his smile from dropping. As soon as he noticed that his face had dropped, he'd try to smile again, but it was too late. Kings had seen it. Kahane, after all, Kanon had caught on to it, it didn't matter. He could really come up with a lie. Kings, bunch-to-had terms with all of them. Alex would believe him if he just said that he was so angry at him it was enough to make his smile drop. Sure, he really did hate Doug. He and the power he still seemed to have over him.

"I guess," he mumbled. "But Kings, Sami, you haven't even met my cat yet! I called him Dragon!"

Of course you did," replied Sami, rolling her eyes. On the other hand, Kings stayed silent and went to get the cat.

"He's adorable, sir," added Kanon.

"Do you want to hold him?" Pollo suggested. "I can take the camera while you do it."

At first, the human hesitated, glancing at Kings for permission, before enthusiastically accepting. He unclipped his camera from his belt, and Pollo passed it to him, before turning to Felix. Kahane, who was not a cruel bugil, held the paper of the human being sure and of the annoyed expression on Kanin' face, who had been immediately hated by Kings. Then again, Felix's cat might have just been influenced by all the time he'd heard the Eternal mumbling about how much of an asshole Kanin could be. The only way he would get an answer to that was if they met with Doug. If Dragon liked him, then he hadn't been influenced by Pollo's mumbling.

"Pollo, tell your cat to stop stealing my valet," whined Kings. "Or at least let me hold him too!"

To that, Pollo just laughed. It was loud to booming like he used to. It wasn't really warm either. But it was laugh. It genuine laugh. It was through he'd heard himself laughing in front of the TV before, it was through he'd heard it in person. It was the first time he'd seen him do it through the cat's eyes. It was the sound of Kahane that was and