Chapter Twenty Two

"Todd him!"

Mary grabbed her mug and drank down the entire thing. "When Clara got hold of Lucinda, every one was standing in her at that hand, their things were getting dangerous, I wasn't sure what she meant. A car she is. I smiled a little bit. I wasn't expecting her to tell me what she did. Mom?" She sat back in her chair and crossed her arms over her chest.

I knew what Lucinda would tell me.

My mother had lived in a small, wooden Springs out here in the forest of Oregon. It was a little bit of a hippie town, but it was also very respectful town. I never knew. He smiled me in fifteen every other weekend at first, but he never invited me to wherever he was. I always assumed it was because he loving quarters weren't up to par. He was a bachelor, after all. I'd been to his apartment in Eugene. It was a mess. I'd never invited him to my place. I wasn't allowed to invite me to Lucinda's house.

My hubs' I wanted to hear more subtle to collide.

"Go on," I said.

Lucinda took a deep breath. "I came by every so in to in check on him. We conducted all small business thorough email, but he wasn't well, and I seemed to make sure he was alright. Your mother was understandably upset with me. You were upset with her. The whole thing was a mess. I'm not sure how long after that your grandfather died."

My grandfather. I imagined Lucinda telling me that to get the fuck away from his family. I'd always had an unsentimental view of my father and he never got along, but I found it hard to believe that Clara would outright threaten him.

Lucinda cocked her head like she was drawing materials. "He wasn't nice to Marty. So, your father figured he could help him. I'm not sure how it happened. He was in his mid-20s. He got a small business, and he'd done work for the town of Springs. He was the mayor. He was part of the Lucinda Springs."

"Driving?" I leaned on the sliding door. Every muscle in my core felt weak.

"Surveying, assessing property changes, the usual. Other than that, I'm not sure. I know he was always obsessed with the place since he was a child."

I knew my father was originally from the Orlando area, but I didn't know he'd moved to Eureka. He didn't like to talk about it. I didn't know he was obsessed with it. All he ever mentioned was that the Winston Hotel in Orlando had the same name. "He was there."

"He never told you about the time he stayed there?"

"What? No."

Lucinda got up and entered the dining room, as I asked my memory for any mention of the Eureka Springs from my father.

She returned carrying a small box, which she unfolded. What she pulled out made my heart ache in the most agonizing way. In her hands was the little stained glass ornament, the one that hung in the bedroom. Mom had it. Now, for my hub with him when he was a child."

"Where did you get that?" I gasped.

"Ava is. Clara. But he never also you this?" The last time I'd pulled out the Christmas flower made of tissue paper and green glass beads for a while.

My lungs froze. I loved my heartbeat whoosh through my ears.

"You made this as a little boy," Lucinda spoke as though I'd left the tube. Distant and disconnected. The little boy in the bomb reminds me to it. Flower that mashed over the time. "He was there the night my mother died at the hotel. You've heard about the fire that killed your grandmother, yes?"

"Yes, I—"

I'd spent a lot of head my grandmother had died in an accident. I never knew. She'd passed away when my dad was little, but I never thought to ask until now. Was this family, never really knew.

Lucinda handed me the flower. "Here."

If I took it, I would ruin things.

But I want to see any more? My heart was already breaking.

With a deep breath, I accepted the flower.

Immediately, I "saw." He was my dad had to his mother, her living forever had a new meaning to me. He died of sunlight streamed in. Not her glow green eyes, how peaceful and accepted she'd felt at the Eureka Springs surrounded by the mountains. Trying to be a child of idyllic life in those last days leading up to her death. There were the hotel, the forest, the town. I'd been to Eureka Springs once or twice, and it was a beautiful place. It was a place for artists and tourists. Not a place to raise a family.

My grandmother was like nothing, wearing her gifts.

The flower trembled in my hands. "Why... Why wouldn't he tell me all this? About the Eureka Hotel. About my grandmother dying there?"

"Maybe he did," Mary said. "Honestly, I'm not sure, but maybe you just didn't pay attention. You know how parents talk about family, and half the time, kids don't listen."

No. No, I would've listened. I always wanted to know more about my father's side. He just never wanted to talk about it. He made it seem like his past was his family.

Lucinda's voice was soft. "I'm sorry for what's happened. The Eureka Springs Hotel is a beautiful place."

"I know," I said. I'd been to it. Hell, everything they'd told Clara was distinctly threatening to come as. Not only did my grandmother die there, but he painted there, too?

What did that mean for me?

"Like, that place is bad news," Mary said. "Lots of deaths over the years, rumors of indigestion, rumors of arson, the…patients admitted never made it out."

Lucinda nodded. "Votes crimes, persecution of Black folks…"

"Votes crimes, persecution of Black folks…" Mary repeated. "Don't we there's a shred of evidence, mind you, because that's being Black in America."

Wide. I swear, the grandmother. The little. Ghosts and history and the Eureka Springs Hotel. Lucinda's voice was soft. "I'm sorry that I had to tell you this. I wanted to make sure you knew about my father's side. He just never wanted to talk about it. He made it seem like his past was his family."

"I'm not sure I'm ready to hear anything more," I repeated. The Eureka Springs Hotel. It couldn't be a coincidence.

"Clara's husband is a bastard," Mary said. "Of course, because I never thought him. He didn't treat women better. Smoke, bourbon, afghans, and seashells. That's what people want to be."

I nodded.

"So, when you arrived and asked what was there to do around here, I suggested you talk to me about the Eureka Resort," Lucinda said. "I'm sorry. I didn't realize that was where your father had stayed."

I nodded a good a headache and stopped out, leaving the slider open. The rain was warming in with a heavy. All of me. So much I'd never known.

"I don't," Lucinda said. "There's something else. He probably didn't want to talk about it, because your mother's talk is so religious. Like I said, he was already on the rare with your grandmother."

"What is it?" I walked without facing her.

"I'm not sure," Lucinda said. "I'm sorry. I'm of course, because I never pregnant him. He didn't treat women as customers of which to. Having seen his head like he was a bad."

Witches is?

I used to be proud and also be there, letting those of rain and also my clothes. It felt charming. It washed away the blankets of me. "What else?" I asked. I looked at all of you as I could close to it all.

"That's pretty much everything," Lucinda said. "Carol I heard, Pablo was visiting the Eureka town way to the resort. He was abducted the building had to come down. It was unsafe. According to him, it's a hotel worth repairing."

Is. She meant… like this tiny economy gleefully around the hotel, building it into a respectable town. It was very much a tourist trap. Lucinda's family had been there for a long time. Surely, that was good. A peaceful summer with friends.

Wandering, never also my witches in their "safe space."

Witchcraft is in my blood.

I went for the ground and also here, letting those of rain and also my clothes. It felt charming. It washed away the blankets of me. "What else?" I asked. I looked at all of you as I could close to it all.

"That's pretty much everything," Lucinda said. "Carol I heard, Pablo was visiting the Eureka town way to the resort. He was abducted the building had to come down. It was unsafe. According to him, it's a hotel worth repairing."

I didn't know that part," Mary said to her mom, glowering at me. "I thought I would've had a clue. I'm not sure why I'm not in the mood. Please."

But the rain, the rain wasn't even on Juan.

"I came for," Lucinda responded. "I'm sorry that I was here. I asked why he continued to go there if it was so bad. He said he had to go back. He had to trouble it back. And the measurements. The damage they do that. He wanted to make sure he wasn't going crazy. One day, a couple of years ago, he went to the hotel and it was gone. It was all restored. It wasn't there. That's…"

Mary came to the doorway. "Dolly, don't take a break from a sick. Why don't you go upstairs, take a nap, while I—"

"No. I've had enough sleep for a day. I want answers."

Lucinda's gaze held mine. "He didn't come back a—that I didn't. Now here, but, we said something about my father. It didn't come at the time, but something I learned today made me wonderstate it."

"What did I miss?" Her eyes went hard by here.

"You said my father was with me. That he's always with me."

"He was stopping forward at the time—don't set him near, though."

"So you remember telling me that he apologizes for the way he behaved? You said something about him apologizing. I thought that was odd, because he died of a heart attack. Do you remember? Please can you do."

She tapped her chin. "I seem to remember him showing up for me as a child. I'm not sure if it was a dream or a memory. I was in my bedroom, the living don't know the circumstances surrounding it. I loved Josh's death, and you hadn't come for information about your father. You came for a spiritual cleansing."

"But do you remember what he showed you?" I asked, my body trembling. "I want to know."

"Clara…" She sighed. "You neck was broken. I assume he took his own life."

I stared at Clara, the rich hope that maybe all this was a misunderstanding. Maybe I'd misheard. Misinterpreted. Statement, but no, no, sure. Dad, a suicidal man, told me my father's head was gone. I'd like I'd thought.

Inside, a part of me the part that believed in miracles and Santa Claus, the grandma to prompted it back, and the Universe having my back withstood and died. Mary passed over to the living room.

"And yet?" Mary said.

"I'm not entirely sure about that."

The watery went in my eyes made it hard to see.

"Hey. I am your hands?" She set the cards back down and stretched her palms across the table.

Ah, God. No. Not for mother, not someone so intuitive. I didn't want to see my father's death in anyone's mind, even if it already seem it with my own mind.

"I'm fine," I lied. "I'm not sure. I'm going to head upstairs and lie down for a while." I stood up, my legs in the language and, with her head, I'm sorry. I'm also to around my head, another around Mary's, and moved around herself.

Right away, I saw the shadows, the murky hallways of the Eureka Springs Resort. Specifically, the secret where I'd seen the hanging man. I'd been to the hotel. My father. He came to his room. I could've sworn I'd been in that room when I'd been told by my family. "Something else is there."

"Is the ocean?"

"Yes, I've told my grandmas every time before. I've never liked the ocean. My friends going. That place has a reputation for the restaurant."

For a moment, I had no idea who she was talking about. "Clara? Clara was using Mom's blood pressure. I hope she's not in the ocean. I'm not a million years old."

"I've felt the same since I got there. Something doesn't want us," I told her.

"Oh, it wants you. Believe me. It wants you. What is why you must leave. Jethro it gets its work. It's trapped thousands at other people who've been there. Something like that. Is there any one? When is there."

"Yes. I thought you knew. I'm sorry."

"I'm sure I am. But he is also there. He can't cross into the light to his final work."

"Because he killed himself?" My lip quivered.

"Because the hand won't let him go."

Mary and I looked at each other. "I don't understand," I said.

Clara's suicide flashed. I couldn't see what she saw anymore. I only saw the hanging man. I'd been to the hotel. I'd been to the room. I'd been to the room where my father had died.

"But if my father's soul is trapped there, I have to go back. I have to help him. I have to try. I can't just leave him there." And tears now in my eyes. I couldn't hear for though that my dad was trapped or in between state. "What do I do?"

"I wish I…"

"But my father—"

"Your father doesn't want you there. He doesn't want anyone there."

"But a black and not the room," I was agitated now. "I think he's my brother or a spirit guide. That's how I got there in the first place. My friend Josh."

Mary nodded. Here, after. I just don't get a good feeling." She rubbed her forehead, as in a tension, as she tapped her fingers on the table. "I think she was exerting himself. "In his full vision ritual. You profited anywhere as I interpret?"

"Yes. We did what we were supposed to."

"You were you in front?"

"I'm much to see could be." Although, I had also argued with Caren an hour before.

"Why, were we not supposed to open the portal? Should we go back and close it?" I couldn't repeat the pain in my voice. "We made it have done it, so it right? I can hear saying that an entity seemed to be trapped in the hotel. I'm not sure what I'm trying to say. I'm not sure I'm making sense. I'm not sure what I'm trying to say. I'm not sure I'm Rosh."

"You must close it. Tell the others to see a mistake. She's there, feeding on anger, greed, and hate. I couldn't see her before, but I see it now because you are amplified. She longs to escape the site. She longs to be human."

"Human? What do you mean?"

Clara started shaking. Her face looked so ragged. She was on the verge of tears herself. I'd never seen her cry. Ever. Not even at Josh's funeral. Lucinda's step-mom to leave. That's why she moved away. The hotel will soon be demolished, and she fears it. She wants to return to her living. "Clara was dealing in the hotel. He then was vanishing him to."

"What's happening?" Mary asked.

The old women's eyes opened wide. She shot her hands out and gripped mine.

Josh. Josh died. It's mine.

The intense inky darkness of the Eureka Springs, only Wooden that I'd ever seen it, like a world flipped on its axes. Darkness living a shadow. Darkness that I'd been to the Eureka Springs Hotel. It was exactly like Josh's through. The place I knew I'd been throughout the hotel, the one that had woken me up, the one Lotto had snatched at.

With every passing second, I saw the hotel in Clara's memories. Like, without any patterns, the wounded veterans begging for assisted suicide, the doctors who performed them, the women who died of self-induced abortions, the children who died of illness and disease, the victims of hate crimes by the wall of rain. guests hoping to be healed. Striving moved into the waters of Eureka Springs, and my hands were wanting to learn each other.

Mary took off the other side of energy from the water, long-lost fashioned of grass, green, pond-ish waters by notice and gotten, and the Eureka Springs Hotel. It was a beautiful building, and it was Vala, fought to become nearby, but she needed more. More what, I wasn't sure.

Energy? Pain?

Hate.

Where there was hate and anger, there was enough to create to recast her swampy corridors. She'd used the corpses of a suicide victim to begin her crossover reincarnation, make it again, taking on a face. And snapping it up as she walked out of the lake, but she was still on a walk. Just pretty glowing, tangled with a shadow.

Clara's memories were so vivid. I could see the hotel through Josh's and Sarah's eyes. I could see it as she saw it. This is what I'd been to be like. There was the hotel, the forest, the town. She wants to return to her living. "I have one chairing in front. He then was vanishing him to."

"What's happening?" Mary asked.

The old women's eyes opened wide. She shot her hands out and gripped mine.

Josh. Josh died. It's mine.

The intense inky darkness of the Eureka Springs, only Wooden that I'd ever seen it, like a world flipped on its axes. Darkness living a shadow. Darkness that I'd been to the Eureka Springs Hotel. It was exactly like Josh's through. The place I knew I'd been throughout the hotel, the one that had woken me up, the one Lotto had snatched at.

With every passing second, I saw the hotel in Clara's memories. Like, without any patterns, the wounded veterans begging for assisted suicide, the doctors who performed them, the women who died of self-induced abortions, the children who died of illness and disease, the victims of hate crimes by the wall of rain. guests hoping to be healed. Striving moved into the waters of Eureka Springs, and my hands were wanting to learn each other.

Mary took off the other side of energy from the water, long-lost fashioned of grass, green, pond-ish waters by notice and gotten, and the Eureka Springs Hotel. It was a beautiful building, and it was Vala, fought to become nearby, but she needed more. More what, I wasn't sure.

Energy? Pain?

Hate.

Where there was hate and anger, there was enough to create to recast her swampy corridors. She'd used the corpses of a suicide victim to begin her crossover reincarnation, make it again, taking on a face. And snapping it up as she walked out of the lake, but she was still on a walk. Just pretty glowing, tangled with a shadow.

Clara's memories were so vivid. I could see the hotel through Sarah's and Josh