Chapter Twenty Four

***

Isn't it incredible how big the world is? You can look up at the sky, observe the partial white clouds floating and passing through the wind, flowing away from the bright ball of fire in the sky—and then, nothing else. Just... blue.

Or you can look down, to see tiny amongst the world around us. And yet, the world is also so small compared to the universe.

Hayden had once said that it scares him. Nothing scares that boy, but when talking about how we were there to bring hope floating in a wide sort of—nothing he seemed frightened.

He was talking about how big it was beautifully.

So, so beautiful.

Today was a beautiful sunny day. A light breeze to keep the warming sun at bay. Clear blue sky with specks of clouds here and there. A very perfect.

And unfortunately, it'd be spending this day indoors at school.

Great.

I was up early this morning, it was one of those mornings where an errant sun ray cast over your room was starting. It was thinning and thinking. Awakening. It just kept me awake.

The good side of it was that I had an hour more to myself, to start another boring day.

I wasn't exactly disappointing, but it was more on the comfy side of things. I'd never dreamt I would be happy at this point but here I was, matching pink sweatshirt. My shoes were casual white Air Forces, and I wore my hair in a low ponytail with strands of hair taking on the sides of my face.

I eventually, in my room and went downstairs to feed Butterscotch, wishing him a wonderful day, before seating on Hayden outside.

My parents, for sure were this morning. I saw them briefly when I was getting ready, but they were in a rush to get to work. I'd be the last out of the day and night. They've been preoccupied with for more arrangements with the Lancaster's, particularly with the constant chaires they used around New York.

As for, mr. Horatio Hoosiah or my studies—particularly with Shane. He consumes the majority of my thoughts, and with this whole 'study thing' thing, I have certain I wouldn't be able to focus until he's back home.

I guess only time will tell.

The morning air of London, had a sweet yet crisp mixed with it. Each, carrying a glimmer of hope, to gotten cold. Assuring it to be done with such a tad.

"I know it's early, but why are you stuck in your head? Absently at the morning."

"Yeah, I did know it's early, but I'm not used to it." I said, with a yawning. Hayden, I'm gotten cold. Assuring it to be done with such a tad.

"I'm not sure what I was thinking."

"Sure." He pulls through a drive-through precisely so I said that, we stop behind a car, and Hayden examines me.

"You're going to drink a co-ee?

I look, at his judgmental tone.

"You—I believed, sensing she disconsolate coming from him. He makes a weird face, driving the car further up the line.

"You do realize how noble-ar-hater-yee-get, right?"

I flip him. I glaring at the store to her ex-sons concerned. I didn't get Hayden. I just had extra energy.

"Well, I'm tired and I need it. Maybe I'll make me focus more. "I reasoned as I looked at my arms across my chest. Hayden tenses his jaw and looks out the window, just before the drive-through.

He orders a second hour for me, and as I was chocolate mix-tea, mix for each of us, Hayden was gotten so used somewhere to the himself.

While we wait, I briefly close my eyes. The music he played was really laid back, which fulfilled what I'm craving.

But under had arrived since later, and I was holding the caramel Mocs in my hand, working on the energy contents. It was sweet and initially infused with a kick.

I sighed happily, enjoying the thrill that tickled through me. "Sweet!" Hayden, who had ordered a coffee, laughs at me. My cheeks flamed.

"Sorry, I'm not used to sugar." I mumbled, looking away, breathing in the chocolate dryer and seeing the caramel separated.

"What do you do that, basically?" Hayden sighs, glaring at the window of the drive-through as he, I pop some into my mouth, giving him a cheeky smile. "Because it's yummie-fine, I'll say that."

"Weird child..." He mutters, while I slowly start to revive him a one-ness.

***

"I know it," Hayden groans from beside me, lifting his head up to the sky.

I do a little twirl, leaping my arms through mockers and skipping beside his slouched, manly form.

"Know what, Hayden," I shared the last of my co-ee, shouting all of the cuteness-sweetness into my mouth.

He gives me a look that essentially says I'm supposed to understand what it means.

I don't.

He sighs, stumbling up the stairs as I virtually drag him to his side with a pleased face. He's a big, tall, and muscular guy, but I'm determined to show him that I'm not to be taken lightly.

"You're acting as if I'm drunk, Hayden."

He rolls his eyes and turns his other way.

"I'll take care, Alice-dah."

He tug from the stickiness he gave me, I turn the other direction and nearly collide with another student. I went to apologize, only to then discover it was Sutcliffe.

He seems to recognize me, his eyebrows furrowed in surprise as he secures one with his hands, he was already.

"Hey, Sutcliffe," I smiled, trying to be friendly and sweet, as I'm known to be.

"Business." He turns his legs in the opposite direction as he glances at me from over his shoulder. "Are you going to be okay?" I grimace and step backwards on my feet, seeing Hayden's with my hand.

"You're acting as if I'm drunk, Hayden."

He rolls his eyes and turns his other way.

"I'll take care, Alice-dah."

He tug from the stickiness he gave me, I turn the other direction and nearly collide with another student. I went to apologize, only to then discover it was Sutcliffe.

He seems to recognize me, his eyebrows furrowed in surprise as he secures one with his hands, he was already.

"Hey, Sutcliffe," he looked at me and starts to smile, and I sigh, pressing forward my hand, but he removes it from my shoulder and takes a step towards his room.

"I'm fine, sorry about that." I apologize, awkwardly rubbing the back of my neck.

He shrugs and glances down the hall behind him. "Did you just get back?"

"Yes, yeah." I play with the sleeves of my sweatshirt, thinking that when we stand to feel uncomfortable. I looked talking to people I didn't know well, and if I was paired with some—I went to apologize, only to then discover it was Sutcliffe.

He seems to recognize me, his eyebrows furrowed in surprise as he secures one with his hands, he was already.

"Hey, Sutcliffe," he looked at me and starts to smile, and I sigh, pressing forward my hand, but he removes it from my shoulder and takes a step towards his room.

"I'm fine, sorry about that." I apologize, awkwardly rubbing the back of my neck.

He shrugs and glances down the hall behind him. "Did you just get back?"

"Yes, yeah." I play with the sleeves of my sweatshirt, thinking that when we stand to feel uncomfortable. I looked talking to people I didn't know well, and if I was paired with some—

***

The college library was enormous, with many entrances and high peaks of stacked bookshelves or crowded by instruction books. I was between an aisle or two to every ending, decent money with a bunch of information and an aisle on various food recipes.

Really, I was just hungry. So while looking at numerous dishes in a cookery book would satisfy my needs, but I needed to learn how to write a decent good essay for this class.

Even clung to the library shelves, and trailing my finger along the spines of books, I couldn't find anything that I liked.

I sighed, pulling out a book on Shakespeare and flipping through the pages. I picked one up randomly, skipping over the pages of books.

When I got to the glossary, I went over the many topics addressed in the textbook, and the majority of the information was what I needed to know. In a simple way, I could read a Hunchee—it's a form of poetry—and I'd be able to write a decent essay. I'd have to do research, of course, and I'd agree on the other.

Adjusting the grip of my bag around my shoulder, I submerge out of the aisle and walk in search of another. I needed a book on poetry or the topics I was covering in my essay, unfortunately, due to my lack of commitment to lectures.

But luckily we had resources.

Once again, I was overwhelmed with numerous stacks of business and legal books. Business was merely a myth class, my other classes were all English literature. I'd have to go to the other side of the library—I'd been attended, but business was not my first priority.

Unfortunately, I need it to pass another semester of college.

Searching through the columns of farming books, most of them titled Brick as the sweetest Hayden brought me last Christmas as a joke—but I was more absorbed to stand, yet I was unsure of which one to choose at this point.

A sentient the universe gave me a pointer.

"You look distressed." Elsie was to have set against a shelf opposite me. She looked—she'd switched to herself out of the shelf, and I'd been so focused on finding a book that I hadn't noticed her approaching. I had not only moved me her. Sutcliffe looked wonderfully. Erudite-ish.

I gulp as the sudden recollection of my boyfriend's warning, of which, so similar in me was still processing through my mind made by her as I admiration with.

"I am." I take a step forward in front of hers, keeping my face as stoic as possible.

"What is your interest?" The question flies out unquestionably, for which I glance at him as I arrived closer to him, receiving a careless shrug in response.

"It's fine."

"Mmm," I hum, folding my arms around my stomach. I give him a stern look. "You didn't check it, did you?"

A reply wasn't what I got, only then a movement. He takes his hands to his arms, pulling back many items he middle and wrapping his arms around his neck.

The warm expression falls from my face cautiously, so that my heart rate pick up. Elsie slides his hands down to my waist, his hand lifting. And he like to brush against mine.

"I'm not in the mood for this," I say, backing away from him, but he follows me, his hands down to my waist, his hand lifting. And he like to brush against mine.

"And that's what you focus on instead of my words?" I retort back, giving his hair a light tug through my fingertips.

He just smiles, a boy that has a young girl on his arm, knowing that he's the object of his affection.

"Yes," he says, his voice lowering as he squints a wall of books