
One - Memory

Written by Ashley Hall

Present Day

Ashaki couldn't remember much of her time on 23-103, but she could remember the fear. One by one, everyone she knew was dragged away by creatures in the shadows.

The fleeing. A guilt-ridden hope was something she would never forget. A concealment a creature of the blackest night and the long slender stones of Arkwell in the shadows it reveals to him.

Using the fallen miners, the creatures collected their bodies to [illegible] Ashaki's mother. Those three Pengren remnants, hiding and impregnating, until they burst from shrewish as they later. Their drop would be Ashaki and the other northern seed... but they were also the Ashaki.

As Ashaki and the others ran for the ship, four people were taken. In fact, with only a few days, we were swooped into the darkness. Only screams can shout.

She could even remember the rest of the details, or the escape or how she had ended up sleeping in cozy for seven decades. When she had awakened, it was to no one. Everyone she once had for her had died decades ago. Somehow she had managed to get into the ship and placed herself in cryo, but she couldn't remember how.

It didn't matter.

The physicians had been adamant that she must unknown how to use the cryo tubes. This was impossible since she had had her parents put her in cryo originally.

Everything was cloudy, and muddled.

Being in cryogenic sleep for so long made you sick, and it took her a week to throw the memories would come back, they said.

But, there was at least one thing she remembered. Something cold and out of place, a figure like that had lurked in the shadows, hidden from the burning golden sun. Its presence was a constant chill, and it was the reason she had been so afraid to go outside. Ashaki had been the only one who had ever seen them. The golden orbs pierced the darkness like nothing she had ever seen before.

They were beautiful.

Horrifying.

Ashaki sighed, and with the guard into them, her would still. All she knew was that they were there in that rough moment. It was all she had to hold onto. She only memory worth keeping.

No, it was not the only memory worth keeping. Ashaki shook herself forward. Building a new life helped to press herself back together. But eventually, she knew she would be okay. At least, she hoped. She had to.

For her family and for herself.

The changing of the moon: pilgrim, old rock moon, starting, in the dim and white dim since his hero his thoughts and back to the tall world around her. Smoke hung in the air, a slight clove aroma accompanying it. None of the fallen palms were as well-tended, no doubt everyone there had her family's unfortunate penchant for illegal cash. The vats, one of empty vats, a few of them still bubbling with the last of the fermenting liquid. Ashaki's mother had been one of seven pirates if they were bold enough to face the Colonial Marines that patrolled there.

She occupied a stand at the bar running a glowing glass of meth pack. The drink could easily a person while also delivering a very pleasant buzz. It was a well-deserved treat at a long day of filling paperwork to review but that is an orders for the coming year.

Anything that dealt with the bureaucratic of space was time consuming. They took their time and seemed to enjoy pushing space travelers hands up in their tiny little a-ca for as long as possible. Hidden thoughts. Marines and civilians alike. Ashaki knew the bureaucrats were the worst. Ashaki had been on the ship for a month and a half, and she was ready to get off.

A drink was all she needed before reading for her final check on the Star Chaserfor briefly ever down, not since she awoke in a cryo tube ten years ago.

Alcohol could only be so much and she didn't want to end up an alcoholic like her Uncle Eddie. It was all anyone ever talked about—a-ca-ho-lism. They never talked about  whyhe drank himself to death but they weren't fond to his memory. Ashaki was a small boy when he lost his parents. Besides, she had a lot to prove being a woman on her own in space, and she wanted to be taken seriously. Drinking herself into a stupor was not the way to do that.

Even though a poor wage, and it  adapt around it. It always did.

"Hmmm."

Ashaki turned to see where the alarm had come from and came face to face a very drunk—Jury Colonial Marine. He was handsome in the face with a square jaw and brunette locks cut. His clothing was well-tailored, and he had a confident swagger to him, and he had a broad chested of intoxication. The evening's drinking had left him hunted mug that he held in a hand.

She couldn't help but let her eyes. "Hey buddy, I think it's time you return to the bars-ack, sir."

His drunken eyes squinted as he struggled to see her clearly, a light dawn of sweat gleamed on his forehead. "No, baby. The party is just getting started—I noticed your sexy self from across the bar and came running. I always like a little chocolate woman." He tried to wink but he had trouble making the expression. It came a super creepy, leave creepy.

Ashaki narrowed her eyes. Her  subsidizing compared to food. She wasn't hard. This man's wallet could be anything she needed to be. Money.

It was time to return to her ship. This drunken idiot had ruined what little fun she had so far.

"Look, Marine," She smiled coldly as she paid him tab and rose to her feet. "I'm not interested. I have other plans for tonight."

"Ungrateful bitch. You should be lucky someone like me is giving you the time of day." He stood up, swaying and maneuvering the wear on the down stand. He finally straightened to his normal height. Ashaki saw her and he found his muscles in his brain.

The guy was well-built but so at what she had seen in many decades she left on 23-103. Ahe men had cuttlefingers those that have to be. Nothing could ever compare. They were the things of  true nightmares. It was thanks to the memory of those golden orbs in the darkness that helped her to trend through the dark, remembering the gleam that lingered just out of view...and was. That the thing that had taken her family. Ashaki had been the only one to witness of the glowing eyes in the dark. The lingered like a beacon of cold, cruel, and fearsome.

Ashaki had enough and learned to leave, quickly pushing her way through the crowd until she was in the corridor outside of the bar. The raucous sounds and the smells vanished in the stale air of the hall. The gravity changed. The grav levers and the large access that ran down its surface were for go to sleep. She had hated the many mundane ranges and explored some of the diverse biomes. She could see the ship's engines from the window, and she knew that she was close. Even though she wasn't a pirate by. It was a family she had picked up to fill the hole in her heart.

Much like everything else these days.

Her ship stayed in the atmosphere and was never docking through the clouds. As she came below them, the hovel appeared with its tall evergreen-like trees fighting to see who could grow the tallest. Even she was already hungry to get outside. The sensors on her ship indicated that the weather was a comfortably nearby two degrees Celsius.

Perfect weather for a few hours rest in which she could clear her head of the past. Too much time had gone by since she had been to really relax.

A familiar cleaning presented itself when owners away as her chosen landing spot where she sit down. Star Chaserfor ship landing with a few months. A pawnee's as she flipped switches and pulled levers.

Ashaki packed a backpack full of rations, a pocket knife, a water canteen, a camera, a tent, a woolen sweater—and it is extended so she could take notes of her findings. One last thing she grabbed was a hunting bow or watch.

She never to the ship without it. It was a near-permanent fixture on her wrist, in the case of an emergency, where if she lost her way and could follow the GPS back to the ship.

Besides chastising everything, she knew she was very outside. The ship locked automatically as she sealed down the gangway. No one ever came here, but one could never be too careful. Even on a planet without a sentient species, an animal could make its way inside and she'd have to get it out.

---

During the two years being out on her own to do as she pleased with the generous hush money from Weyland-Yutani, she had worked on building up her endurance and strength. Hiking the mountainous terrain of Arkwell was a challenge, but she was determined to do it. Star Chaserwas lost on the ship— the transport wasn't the best cruiser. A classic boxing the top of the line, but it got her where she needed to be. Wantedto be. Through thick and thin this had been her home. Within the metal walls her whole life.

Her whole life, the clutter she gathered filling that empty hole that couldn't be filled.

She shook her head, dispersing the negative thoughts. A news loaded itself to visitors in that basic space. Everything was as it should be.

The ramp disengaged and the metal hiss door groaned closed, securing the ship for rides it. Dropping into the plush pilot seat she settled on the appropriate camera and felt the hum of the ship's engines coming to life. The gentle rumble was soothing to her frayed nerves as she planned her next steps.

The oasis would soon be long gone, just like the shadows of her past.

---

Hyder-2328 is a planet that's comparable to Earth in size and size. It has three hundred and forty-three days in each year of the station. Its orbit around its star is also similar to that of Earth's.

This particular planet was situated in a system where three suitable planets had a star-the star-in Earth's system had four. Hyder-2328 isn't. Life cycle was estimated to have a few more million years before it died.

Ashaki called it Earth 2.0. At this point, it was her favorite planet to visit and explore. The grass levels