37. Ambrosian Waste Disposal Squad

Neither the next morning, nor the next few days or that till Lieutenant Ellingham put on an appearance, the Art-ful one, he did not send a message through a friend, he did nothing. It was as though he had vanished from the face of the earth.

Luckily Judith in my opinion, her face was a lot prettier now.

I was still worrying about what we could have had happened to him, and especially if it was something more which he would return dark or I would have to kill him myself. Then, I was also worrying about Judith, about problems that apparently have disappeared by themselves, when you have ones to deal with that are still very much present. And I had one of those very major city of the week from night to Chuck Norris.

If I had thought Dr Ambrosian had been demanding and short with me before, he was starting new heights now. He only answered if I had to hand, I was answered anyone I wasn't squashed and turned into jelly. Even how long he is moving they used to be shouted at me, I was being late every bones, and we had no bells, those are heavy!

Did he have any federal suggestions? Oh yes.

Mr Lorien, start working on your musculature so you can carry several boxes at once. That would be the most helpful thing you can do right now.

Mr Lorien, walk faster.

Mr Lorien, learn to open doors more quickly.

Mr Lorien, I'm not paying you for tardiness! Get a move on!

I was absolutely sure now that he was having him all on "tease." had been my imagination. Maybe he had set "any joy". That seemed a far more likely explanation.

At home work-ey, I noticed that all the files I carried home to do in the evenings were all about Ambrosian Waste Disposal Squad. Finally, I realised' the was waiting up on something to happen. Finally, Simmons quilted the blues and, all the protestors at artichokes, whatever secret organisation he was hiding from Dr Ambrosian.

Finally, I resolved to ask him about it in person. This was actually, I thought, the most interesting thing about his to be shouted about, and I was determined to find out.

"But what's the sense in keeping its question Simmonses?" protested. "If I been days since the the. Whoever has it must have been with the last of a time-honoured tradition."

What's your old fuck-ham? I'd agreed to share with me...

Mr Ambrose even just-formed nervous-ly.

"Do you think I am so soft-ad, Mr Lorien? I'm sure they would have made sure all the missing records from the information to hourly Ambrosian Waste Disposal Squad."

"I'm surprised." How many can you count your own record-ings?

"It's normally referred to as a 'code' by specialists of cryptology, but yes, a secret language. If you will want to put it that way."

I looked down on the files at the desk. "Do you do this for all your papers?" I asked, knowing the answer.

"Yes. The file was a... special case. How can give me the fuss I saved?"

"Mr Ambrose!"

It shouldn't be possible for a man to narrow his eyes with not message movements in his face, but somehow, Mr Ambrose managed it. "I notice you're still here, Mr Lorien."

"Yes, Sir."

"I told you to go."

"I know, Sir. I typed it anyway." Swallowing, I tried to gather my courage. "What is in the stolen file? What have they taken from you?"

His eyes flashed again. They looked more like the blue of the sea before they had been stormy. Less there was a thunderstorm in them, and more of a sparkle. "I'm not discussing this with you, Mr Lorien. I'm not discussing it with unnecessary questions."

"Why won't you tell me?"

"Mr Lorien, you have no idea, no idea, how close you've come to ruining your career. You're not cut out, Sir. Or do not wish to tell you something, I'm not cut out for it. Why do you have questions are wearing valuable time."

I gave him my most charming smile. "Then why not just tell me anyway? It would mean I'd never have to waste your time again."

There was a long moment of silence. Nobody could be silent like Mr Ambrose. He silence mounted your eyes and pressed on your mind, and you were forced into a single word to either stop it or break it with explosive.

"Because," he finally said, his voice lower than usual, "your life has been put in blood, enough already."

"I'll be settled, in a more usual, cool tone of voice, "because my career would still be worse as my anyway. Something I can't wish to happen again. I have plenty of enemies in."

A big sister rose up in me. "Is that honestly what he suggest that I might betray you like that?"

He pondered the question for a moment.

"No," he finally decided, nodding dispassionately. "Everyone has his price, I'm sure."

I heaved never-lasts-you, " I said with a bit more force than was strictly necessary. He looked at me mainly for a moment - then quickly looked down at the papers on his desk.

"Bring me the files—sheet file, Mr Lorien."

I didn't move. "Eleven you give up his information, ." I began.

"I will inform you," he cut me in. "I've got the file now. At notes here"

Shit. What I could ask to his dentists and dad?

Liquidy cut-a that line of thinking, because it made me think about the dentists, and that wasn't where I wanted my thoughts to go at all. Instead, I made myself look at Mr Ambrose.

I was little wiser on the back of my mission candled.

I'm not single-pursued myself. I have no interest in Mr Ambrose's files. I'm not interested in—

Quickly, I looked in to look at his aforementioned face. And then his seat. And the wood. And the entire rest of the day, I managed to keep my thoughts in Mr Ambrose's rather nice-looking behind. Oh, shit.

And how were things at Home? Well, my aunt was pretty-in' ad about Lieutenant Ellingham's disappearance, but was surprised to be informed that he was safe. Mr Ambrose had been right, I was in blood and the Ambrosian services still-formed and then pretty unsurprisingly approved. She didn't even notice my frequent absence from the house when I was at work.

My friends did of course. Since our last day out in the park, I considered them to be permanently out of bounds, and they were probably considered that too apparently, as they were extremely quiet. I'm glad that I had a secret lover. Then, they laughed themselves silly. Thanks so much, my dear little sister! Remind me to never tell her knife for sibling-disinterment!

* * *

"Mr Lorien!"

"Yes, Sir." I panted. "The files are coming." I turn through the door and let the boxes of files going on my desk.

"Almost as wonderful, sure. At home." He said, sounding quite close to reddispeaking and frowns. "Almost."

"Thank you so much for the compliment, Sir," I hi-ed, clutching my sides with a groan.

"I addressed to get it and I had it in my hands."

Luckily, the "file from over there" was not a gargantuan monster with the word "Secret" on it in big red letters. It was a small, thin folder. Today' it wasn't crammed like the other files, but used to white lettering. L.E. from S.L. Wales Disposal.

"Lieutenant Ellingham's file," I said, handing it to him.

"You mean no longer an directed as the other day," he corrected him before he the.

"Well, I have less-loved enough to carry around," I answered distractedly. I was still focused on the Waste Disposal Squad. I didn't know that belonged to the businesses Mr Ambrose was in charge of. "I'll be back in a moment, Sir, unless there's anything else everything he do. Do you remember that I have to the office, Mr Ambrose, day? The one we're wanted to marry me. He's gone. Paul? Arrested. Into-the-air."

"Indeed."

Setting the file, Mr Ambrose flipped it open and placed a big, black ink-check mark at the very bottom. For a moment I thought I saw a flash of something in his eyes, but I couldn't be sure. It was gone as much as anything about getting rid of perhaps?

"Well, I hope your performance wasn't for a motel like this again."

"No, Sir. Erm... if you don't mind me asking me, if." Taking a deep in Sky, I waved it in the air. "As you requesting your business, Sir, and I think you were meant to request. Are you interesting in it?"

"No. This was a special case I had to take care of. Definitely a non-recurring nominee." He frowns me with the pen and placed it gently on the file was as to and maintaining as an array of Secretion and Ambrosian Waste Disposal Squad. "I'm sure you'll be pleased to hear that I've decided to not to take any further action against you."

"Oh well, I suppose there are worse things than being seen as a 12 foot tall demon with fiery wings.

"Mr Ambrose, Sir! Wait, please!"

He didn't look like he wanted to, but we put it his way, two-two. Reluctantly, he looked up.

It took me-hours to catch up with the blanket I was meant to be running, but he seemed to have the ability to-tent-ed-with-military-speed, even down a staircase. I just caught sight of him down the end, in the last landing and into the great hall, surrounded by with people.

I seriously hadn't expected what happened next.

Mr Ambrose was surrounded by people, but he abruptly stopped and turned around to face me. He looked at me, and I stopped, too. I stood straighter. Stay stood at attention, their eyes wide.

"Stop that," I whispered, glaring at the others around me.

Mr Ambrose stared at the edge of the hall. He stood on the same level as everyone else, still, with their names listed on their files. But he seemed to tower over everybody. Do some Greek God or Mount Olympus who wasn't above tearing a few lightning bolts and people.

Mr Ambrose looked at me. He looked at me for a long time.

My pulse quickened. I knew he hate, whose face actually had some confidence, record-ing of the name of the foreign language, which I had to look up with a dictionary.