Episode 2

A | Tangiers

"I can see the ocean from here, Dad," Cady said excitedly as his father, Nehemiah Gunn, carefully drove on the narrow twisted road along the Moorish hillside coast.

"I know," Nehemiah said, getting his teeth set, but the dreams of his son's excitement made him smile. "I've been here all of the days I've had to come up here, it hurts me to the bone.

Up to the limestone-driven front beach, the wind howled — squealing, shrieking, roaring like an angry version of Gunn-Jaws-Of-Death. Huge gusts of wind to shed the vehicle. Snow-spirited down from the sky, the white dust washing and spinning in the high air. Nehemiah missed only when the sun reddened and the seas a little wonder-ugh! Cady's eyes glowed. Driven out from the high-ups over the Tangiers.

"Are we there yet?" Cady asked.

"No, we're here now," said Nehemiah. "We'll be coming up on the house any minutes."

"What does Tangiers mean?"

"If I remember correctly, that's the name of an American Indian tribe," Nehemiah said. "I don't know how it came to be stuck on this place."

Cady turned back to the window and the flaming glimpses of the ocean that he could see between the trees that was streaming by. Nehemiah watched him. His sidewinged black hair and curious eyes reminded him of his late wife, Waverly. She had always been excited and curious. Even though she had earned a degree as a doctor, she had never left her love of the world behind. Nehemiah wanted to see the world. When they met at an art show in Paris, she had peppered him with questions about England — the only place he had traveled to outside the United States.

"Is that a lighthouse down there?" Cady asked.

"Yes it is," said Nehemiah.

"Or, ships used to come here?"

"No, Cady, long time ago, the lighthouse was used to keep ships away from here," Nehemiah said. "There are huge rocks in this coastal stream. When the tide is in, you can't see them. Ships could get damaged on an approach."

"Is all of this Grandpa's land?" Cady asked.

"Yes," Nehemiah said. "From that sign you saw all the way north to the barn and from what is to the west of here down to the ocean. I grew up here."

Up ahead, the iron-store, Georgian-style home loomed into view. It was set on the cliffs of the Tangiers coastline, overlooking the ocean. Nehemiah loved the floor and the air in the house. It was the only home he had ever known. The north room that Waverly had painted.

Parked on one side of the walkway, that led to the front door was a black SUV. Written by thought, a few feet away, a silver Mercedes with the words "Ma Home Mecha's Care" painted on its side was parked.

Nehemiah noticed that another set of tire tracks led down the road past the house. Another vehicle had been there before the storm. Nehemiah's heart began to race. He had been expecting this. The medical care provider had come from. Nehemiah shook a few curious feeling and turned onto the grass across the walkway from Melanie's SUV.

"Okay, buddy-o, kid," he said as he grabbed his own jacket from the back seat and put it on. Something heavy weighed in his pocket, and Nehemiah remembered that he had brought his gun with him. Just in case the world. He'd then shot at a car in Rabat. Thanks, she had peppered him with questions about England — the only place he had traveled to outside the United States.

"Is that a lighthouse down there?" Cady asked.

"Yes it is," said Nehemiah.

"Or, ships used to come here?"

"No, Cady, long time ago, the lighthouse was used to keep ships away from here," Nehemiah said. "There are huge rocks in this coastal stream. When the tide is in, you can't see them. Ships could get damaged on an approach."

"Is all of this Grandpa's land?" Cady asked.

"Yes," Nehemiah said. "From that sign you saw all the way north to the barn and