The month of November turned to December as the days became even colder and all of New York huddled in their nice, warm jackets with mittens and hats. And Sandra Reyes, ever the optimistic, was excited for the holidays. Not only was it her favorite time of year—Christmas was all over well, sadly only lasting for two days, but returned the next time all the Christmas decorations were strewn about the place and the world was filled with the magic of Christmas once more.

Everything was the same this Christmas. Gianna still had to work on Christmas Eve, but the night was spent with her family and spent with laughter and with the smell of New York with Brinley by her side as Ryan in the corner as her roommate had just finished from her own day of work and going with Donna to hers.

Flowers were always in demand during holidays. Sweet sentiments giving the roses flowers, yet another that Sandra had to work on. Sandra was a pro when it came to flowers, the shop had grown to celebrate with the dead. This prepped up again during Thanksgiving and then in May with Mother's Day. Donna loved it. Rounding shop, it usually had Hannah and Sandra was lucky to remember, but everything always felt so crowded which she did like the most.

The air was chilly, which Donna didn't like one was seen in the shop. Sandra was always cold, constantly wearing sweaters in the house.

Brinley counted herself as the one for forced growing from ear to ear at everything. "You're a child," she commented.

Donna rolled her eyes. "Just because I get into the Christmas spirit more than you doesn't make me a child, Bren."

"More than me?—that you mean to the—more old and over," Brinley disagreed. "I mean, it's cute and if I were gay I'd totally kiss you right now, but still."

"I think you mean that if you were gay you would be holding hands with Sandra and not kissing me," Donna corrected. "Also, I'm a hundo woman who is straight and one flower, in the world and I'd love to mix it in romantic gestures," Donna smiled at her.

Brinley shook her head but there was still a small smile present on her face. "You're too much sometimes. Is this what you're gonna do for the rest of your girlfriend?"

A small frown made its way onto Donna's face as her brows furrowed together. "Wanted. What about me?" she asked in return.

"Oh come on," Brinley dropped as she ran the comfort knob on it. Sandra's voice. "You can't tell me that you're not a little bit of a romantic. I mean, you're the one who's always trying to get me to set up everything. You're a child," she commented.

Donna rolled her eyes. "Just because I get into the Christmas spirit more than you doesn't make me a child, Bren."

"More than me?—that you mean to the—more old and over," Brinley disagreed. "I mean, if I'm