Chapter 24 She Still Has A Chance

Lennard's tone also seemed cautious.

Wendy glanced at him. "No, I'll have lunch outside. Didn't I make an appointment with the Virus Research Institute this afternoon? I'll head back after signing the contract,"

Carl nodded in response.

Two in the afternoon.

Rosalie and Yves set off from the research institute and headed to the place they had made an appointment with the medicinal material supplier. On the way, Rosalie suddenly recalled that she had not had the time to learn about the conditions of the cooperating business, so she asked Yves, "What is the situation with the supplier we are to sign with?" As the person in charge of the research institute, the other party might feel that they had a poor attitude if she knew nothing about the cooperation with the supplier when signing the contract. This would inevitably affect the relationship between the two parties. Yves had also guessed her worries and briefed her in detail, "The supplier is huge in Coast City, and the family behind it started in medicine. On the other hand, the price this supplier offered is relatively reasonable, coupled with the influence of our research institute overseas, they got to know of us and intend on working with us. They have a good attitude. You can rest assured." Listening to what he said, Rosalie nodded in understanding and heaved a sigh of relief. "I know a few big medicinal material suppliers in Coast City. Based on what you said, this contract with us today should be with one of them. Do you know which one it is?" "The Fuller family," replied Yves.

And she happened to have a history with that family.

Thinking of this, Rosalie frowned slightly. She only hoped that she would not be that unfortunate to meet the person she did not want to see the most.

Not long later, the two reached the coffee shop that was agreed on.

The person from the medicine business had not arrived.

Rosalie and Yves first found a seat and ordered two cups of coffee while waiting for the other. About ten minutes later, someone knocked on the door of the booth.

Yves braced himself and said to Rosalie beside him.

Rosalie nodded and stood up. “Please come in,” she said. Almost instantly, the door pushed open, and a man’s voice sounded. “Our apologies, we’re late.”

Rosalie looked up and ahead and ended up meeting Wendy Fuller. Rosalie sighed and thought, ‘You truly attract what you fear.’

Wendy stared in wide-eyed amazement. Her voice was a little sharp from her agitation. “You... Rosalie Jacobs? Why is it you!”

Did she not disappear long ago? Why would she appear here?

Seeing Wendy’s reaction, Yves and Carl were somewhat surprised. With an attitude that took the other as a cooperating partner, Yves kindly asked, “President Fuller, do you know Dr. Jacobs?”

Wendy’s expression changed again. “Dr. Jacobs?”

“This is the general director of our research institute, Rosalie Jacobs. Learning that we will be signing a contract today, she had purposefully joined me to show the sincerity of our research institute,” introduced Yves. Wendy’s expression instead became uglier and uglier. She just wanted to know when Rosalie Jacobs came back!

Byron confessed to her for the first time in six years this morning that his intention was to
